You have participated in a class assignment to help develop a hypothetical psychological assessment. You may have been asked questions about harming yourself (or others), using substances, or experiencing/observing traumatic experiences. People who experience thoughts of harming themselves (or others) or consider their substance use problematic because it interferes with their daily functioning can benefit by seeking assistance and support. You may also be having other types of disturbing thoughts (e.g., reexperiencing a traumatic event in your mind, ruminating over sad thoughts) or actions (e.g., avoiding particular events/locations/people or verbal/physical outbursts) that is causing you distress. Whether this applies to you or someone you know, here is a list of resources you can utilize:

If an option, contact your psychologist/mental health counselor or primary care physician/psychiatrist
